English has remained the international language for several decades. More people than ever are studying English in Japan in order to improve their job opportunities or communicate with people from other countries. The English language has most influenced the educational system and the job market in Japan.

Learning English has become a high priority in Japan during the past twenty or thirty years. The Japanese government requires that each public school student must study English from the age of twelve until the completion of high school. Moreover, many Japanese children study English after school at a private English institution. This type of school is called 'eikaiwa' in Japanese. The majority of Japanese parents are eager to pay good money for these lessons, which are almost always taught by native English speakers. Furthermore, many working professionals also study English at eikaiwas in the evening or during their day off.

English has also influenced the Japanese job market. The job market can be highly competitive in Japan. The chances of finding a good job often depend on the level of English that one can speak. Therefore, working adults are eager to take English lessons after long hours at the office. Many Japanese take the TOEIC, which is a test that measures English proficiency. People with high scores increase their potential to land reliable employment.

In conclusion, there is no doubt that English has played an important role in the educational system and job market of Japan. Obviously, it will continue to be important for many years. It will also continue to play a similar role in many other countries throughout the world. `
